

LEBANESE JURY-ROOM DRAMA

tnaash

Twelve jurors. One Syrian defendant.
One dissenting vote. In post-explosion
Lebanon, Tnaash turns a first fictional jury trial into a fast pressure-cooker of prejudice and reasonable doubt.

Arabic · Lebanon · 86 min · 2022 · Boudy Sfeir, writer-director

“What would happen if a group of Lebanese people, from different sectarian and political backgrounds, were forced to reach a unanimous decision?”

BOUDY SFEIR, WRITER/DIRECTOR

SYNOPSIS

Post-explosion Lebanon stages its first jury trial and seals twelve citizens inside a deteriorating room at the national electricity company. They must decide whether a young Syrian refugee murdered a social activist. The death penalty is in play.

Eleven hands go up for guilty. One juror says not guilty, not because he is sure, but because the room has not earned certainty. From there the film moves by reversals and faction shifts until the case starts sounding like a country arguing with itself.

A high-stakes Arab jury drama that lands first where accent, class, and nationality decide credibility.

It starts with viewers who know what it means to be read before they are heard, then widens through suspense and conversation.

113M

EGYPT

MENA's largest audience.

Displacement, class friction, and the refugee argument are already daily life.

37M

SAUDI ARABIA

44% expatriate population. Status, accent, and belonging read instantly in everyday life.

#1 MENA

PERFECT STRANGERS

Adult Arabic conflict scales when the hook is clean and the conversation starts fast.

The film works because viewers locate themselves fast: who deserves doubt, whose accent counts against them, and who is rushing the room toward a verdict.

WHO FEELS THIS FIRST

Egypt

The film reads instantly in Egypt: who gets believed, who gets suspected, and who is judged before the facts arrive. The Syrian defendant makes that fault line visible immediately.

Saudi Arabia

In Saudi Arabia, the film plays first as status sorting: who sounds local, who reads as outsider, and who gets the presumption of innocence. In an expatriate-shaped society, that lands fast.

Pan-Arab + Diaspora

Across the region and diaspora, the room feels familiar: macho certainty, sect memory, class shorthand, and institutions asking for trust they have not earned.

WHY IT PEAKS NOW

The pressures are hotter now than at first release: Syrian displacement is unresolved, Beirut still has no accountability, and Egypt has absorbed 1.5M Sudanese refugees since 2023.

The story still plays as current, not catalogue.

Boudy Sfeir

Lebanese writer-director working across theatrical features, Arabic-platform originals, and streaming series

Sfeir combines authored feature instincts with platform-tested storytelling. His work moves from psychological thriller and folk comedy to premium Arabic series, and Tnaash condenses that range into an 86-minute jury-room film with a clean hook, escalating reversals, and serious thematic weight.

CINEMATIC APPROACH

Sfeir treats the jury room as a national pressure chamber. Snap-zooms, hard editorial pivots, and the noise of the street keep Lebanon pressing in on every exchange, turning speech into momentum and disagreement into suspense.

This ensemble gives the film multiple recognition pathways before the verdict even lands. Tarek Yaacoub led Broken Keys, Lebanon's 2022 Academy Award submission and a Cannes Un Certain Regard selection. Christina Farah and Mohamad Assaf appeared in The Insult, Lebanon's first Oscar-nominated feature. Assaf also anchored Al Hayba across six seasons, while Ali Al Najjar connects to Makhraj 7 and Haqq Arab. That matters because the film does not arrive as an unknown-faced chamber piece. It carries festival-circuit credibility, premium-series familiarity, comedy and stage reach, and a recognisable Lebanese screen texture. Sany Abdul Baki, Tony Dagher, and Sara Abdo widen the appeal beyond straight arthouse viewing.
